Dear WEX hiring team,

WEX caught my attention because this Account Executive role is built around the part of account work I know best: understanding what a client needs, staying accountable after the sale, and keeping internal teams focused on useful outcomes. My background includes seven years of direct healthcare account leadership, followed by enterprise product work and hands-on AI implementation.

For more than seven years, I managed Fortune 500 pharma and healthcare relationships with $2M-$50M+ budgets. As one of two consumer account leads on FCB Health's largest pharma account, I worked across brand planning, integrated campaigns, and MLR review. I turned client priorities into briefs, feedback, production requirements, and timelines across account, creative, UX, and development teams. Clients expected clear direction and steady follow-through.

Since then, my product work has made me more useful in the kind of account role WEX describes. At Kinesso, I led enterprise analytics and design-system work used by 7,000+ people across 22 brands. I also built a Digital Experience Audit workflow that turned performance data into benchmarks, recommendations, visualizations, and presentation-ready client outputs. At Hedgehox and One Block Away, I take client questions from discovery through working product workflows, demos, and iteration. Those projects have shown me how product behavior, reporting, and service coordination affect the value a client sees.

My background is in healthcare agency account leadership and enterprise product delivery rather than a conventional SaaS book of business, so I would be learning WEX's formal renewal process and benefits products. The operating habits are familiar: understand the client's goals, make the product useful, use data to guide the next action, and bring in the right people when an account needs attention.

I would welcome the chance to discuss how that account judgment and product fluency could support WEX's mid-market clients.
