Dear Boulevard team,

Boulevard caught my attention because the product marketing challenge is specific in the right way. Salon and spa growth is not a generic SaaS story. The buyer lives inside appointment books, service capacity, client retention, front-desk pressure, staff workflows, and the small moments that determine whether a client comes back. The PMM who wins here has to understand the market, make the customer pain concrete, and turn Boulevard's platform into a story that sales, product, and operators can all use.

That is the work I have done from adjacent angles for 15 years. I have moved between client strategy, healthcare and consumer communications, UX research, product positioning, AI POC development, and enterprise workflow design. At Heartbeat and across earlier agency roles, I translated stakeholder interviews, competitive audits, patient and HCP journeys, brand strategy, and regulated review needs into clear digital experiences and campaign work. At Kinesso, I helped scale product design from 2 to 30 people and led analytics and audit workflows used by 7,000+ users across 22 white-label brands.

More recently, I have been building products where the message and the workflow have to mature together. At Hedgehox, I turned complex AI review, scoping, and submission workflows into product narratives, demos, and stakeholder-ready proof, including Claims Detector and Scope Generator. At One Block Away, I built ListingPal from an unclear real estate AI idea into a working POC and landing page that turns property inputs into listing copy, social posts, ad copy, styling direction, and MLS/SEO-ready language in under 90 seconds. Those projects required the same PMM muscle Boulevard needs: find the pain, shape the use case, make the product understandable, and give the go-to-market team language they can actually sell.

I would not come in claiming to be a lifelong salon or spa insider. I would come in as someone who knows how to become useful in a vertical quickly: interview operators, listen for workflow friction, map buyer and client journeys, separate real pain from nice-to-have features, and convert that into positioning, launch content, sales enablement, competitive framing, and proof points. Boulevard's roots in front-desk discovery are exactly the kind of product discipline I respect.

What I can bring is a useful intersection for Boulevard: service-business operations, client experience, customer-facing strategy, adoption-sensitive product UX, regulated healthcare communication, and practical product storytelling. I can help Boulevard clarify where it plays to win in salon and spa, sharpen the market narrative, and build the materials that make the platform feel less like software and more like a better way to run the business.

I would welcome the chance to talk about how I can help Boulevard deepen its salon and spa growth strategy and turn customer insight into sharper product marketing.
