Dear hiring team,

I am applying for the CX Lead role with Confidential Employer. My background combines enterprise customer experience, product strategy, research, analytics, and digital delivery. For more than six years, I have led UX and experience work across a large B2B product suite, backed by eight years managing digital campaigns, consumer web programs, CRM work, and cross-functional client delivery.

At Kinesso, I led research and UX strategy for more than 20 products used by 7,000+ people across 22 white-label brands. I built the company's first UX research practice with interviews, prototype testing, beta groups, behavioral analytics, and shared documentation. Findings and adoption data became roadmap priorities for navigation, dashboards, personalization, brand theming, and product support. I also helped turn channel scoring, benchmarks, and recommendations into a repeatable digital experience audit with client-ready outputs.

Earlier agency roles gave me another side of the customer journey. I worked across consumer websites, digital campaigns, loyalty, CRM patient support, online communities, and integrated brand programs. That work required clear briefs, timelines, production coordination, status reporting, and close partnership across strategy, content, UX, creative, development, and client teams.

The clearest gap is direct ownership of an eCommerce storefront and a formal CRO program. I would not present my background as if I already owned a checkout funnel or a named experimentation stack. What I do bring is the operating discipline around it: research the journey, find the friction, connect behavior and performance data to priorities, coordinate the work, and keep the customer need visible through delivery.

I would welcome a conversation about how that mix of enterprise CX, digital strategy, and delivery leadership could support the team's regional customer experience roadmap.

Sincerely,

Wally Mostafa
